

stars insights: 18 May 2021

Sudan Opens for Business

Yasuyoshi Chiba/AFP via Getty Images

After decades of strife and bloodshed, Sudan has made significant gains in the two years since its revolution, adopting important economic reforms and gradually rejoining the international community. Now, the country needs investment, and it has no shortage of profitable opportunities to offer, writes Prof. Dr. Volker PERTHES, Special Representative of the UN Secretary-General to the Sudan, Head of the UN Integrated Transition Assistance Mission in Sudan (UNITAMS) and Member of the stars Scientific Board.

Investing in Sudan may sound like a strange idea, given that the country has long been marred by civil war and intercommunal conflict, crippled by sanctions, and, until recently, ruled by a president facing an arrest warrant from the International Criminal Court (ICC). Nonetheless, the French government has invited Sudan's political leadership, as well as other world leaders, to an investment conference in Paris on May 17, and there are good reasons to believe it is the right move.

Much has changed in Sudan since April 2019, when a popular uprising toppled President Omar al-Bashir. The country has been removed from the US Department of State's "Sponsors of Terrorism" list, and it has begun to cooperate with the ICC. With the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund both acknowledging Sudan's progress on economic reforms, the country is moving closer to qualifying for debt relief.

Currently, Sudan is governed by a transitional administration under a power-sharing agreement between the military and a broad civilian coalition of party and civil-society representatives. Though the arrangement is hardly a marriage of love, it offers a model of pragmatism in a region that sorely needs it.

The power-sharing agreement is intended to shepherd Sudan through a 39-month transition period that will end in late 2022, after the launch of a constitutional drafting process and parliamentary, presidential, and regional elections. Against all odds and predictions, the country's experiment in military-civilian cohabitation has survived for more than a year and a half, owing largely to personal commitments from Prime Minister Abdalla Hamdok and the chairman of the Sovereignty Council, General Abdel Fattah al-Burhan.

Emerging from 30 years of dictatorship and 65 years of almost continuous civil war would pose a challenge for any new government. In Sudan's case, the most important step toward peace so far has been the October 2020 Juba Peace Agreement between the government and a wide-ranging group of rebel movements from Darfur and beyond. These groups are now represented in both the Sovereignty Council – which acts as a collective head of state – and in the cabinet. And negotiations with the most relevant party not to have signed on to the agreement, the Abdel Aziz al-Hilu faction of the Sudan People's Liberation Movement-North, are set to begin on May 25.

Moreover, the transitional authorities have made progress in rejoining the international community through the adoption of agreements and treaties such as the Convention Concerning Forced or Compulsory Labor. They are also working diligently to design a federal system that will accommodate the country's specific political needs (with plans for a major conference on the issue this month). Other important items on the agenda, such as forming a Transitional Legislative Council, are overdue, but it is hoped that they will be taken up soon.

True, hurdles to a lasting peace remain. The Sudanese state and its security institutions are severely understaffed, underequipped, and overwhelmed by the task of coping with unresolved intercommunal conflicts and criminal militias. And the economic challenges are even more daunting.

But this is to be expected in a country that has undergone a revolution and then a pandemic. Economic conditions in the first two years after the revolution included annual inflation above 300%. Under these circumstances, Sudan's financial situation has deteriorated considerably, such that bread and fuel queues cost household members hours at a time.

Nonetheless, the government has pursued important economic reforms, not least lifting fuel subsidies and floating the currency. It is working closely with the IMF to fulfill conditions for debt relief. With the support of the World Bank and the World Food Programme, the government has launched a cash-transfer program to shield the most vulnerable segments of the population from the effects of economic restructuring.

Putting Sudan on the path to sustainable development will require more than humanitarian and development aid. The country desperately needs private investment. With domestic reforms underway to improve Sudan's investment climate, there are real opportunities emerging in infrastructure, regional connectivity, agriculture, food industries, and electricity.

Just imagine a future in which Sudan's harbor in Port Sudan is connected by road and rail to Darfur, and from there to landlocked Chad, South Sudan, and the Central African Republic. Sudan's mango harvest, one of the largest in Africa, could be juiced and exported directly to Europe.

Long-term investment in Sudan is increasingly looking not just possible but highly lucrative. An African country with massive potential is opening up for business. The smart money should get in now.

Prof. Dr. Volker PERTHES is Special Representative of the UN Secretary-General to the Sudan and Head of the UN Integrated Transition Assistance Mission in Sudan (UNITAMS). From 2005 to 2020, he served as Director of SWP, the German Institute for International and Security Affairs (Stiftung Wissenschaft und Politik, SWP), a think tank which primarily advises the German Parliament and the Federal Government on foreign and security policy issues. From 2006 to 2019, he also taught as Adjunct Professor at Humboldt University Berlin. As UN Assistant Secretary General, Perthes supported the UN Special Envoy for Syria and headed the UN Cease Fire Task Force for Syria from 2016 to 2018. His areas of expertise include German and European foreign and security policy, geopolitics and international relations, international organizations as well as regional dynamics in the Middle East. Perthes is also a Member of the stars Scientific Board.

The views expressed here are solely those of the author and they do not necessarily represent or reflect the views of the stars Foundation. This article, in a slightly different form, has first been published on 7 May 2021 on PS (Project Syndicate).

stars insights are exclusive contributions by business leaders and experts who scan the horizon to discuss geopolitical, economic, technological and further trends and developments which will impact society and business in the next few years.

Impressum